A pretty conceit for their costumes is the rainbow fancy, when each is dressed in a pretty tipt of color that gives effect to the pure simplicity of the bridal robe. Where, however, white is preferred, there is no prettier material for the attendant maidens than white wool; this can be trimmed with gold braid or striped with ribbon and lace. Where this sayle is adopted the bodice may be of white moire or brocade silks and a delicate color is often used. The dress is frequently cut in princesse forms at the side with parrow backs, full and While some may laugh others must weep and mourning toilets have their place in fashion's record. Nothing is so desirable as the Henrietta cloth of modern weave for dresses. The best taste is little frill and furbelow as possible. The nnet usually is of the same material as the dress. Some widows still prefer those of crape, they are then of English crape doubled and plain on the frame, with only some simple folds on the edge for their trimming, as they are covered by the veil. A tiny puff of crimped white crape forming the widow's cap is now worn inside the bonnet. The strings of mouraing bonnets are of black grosgrain

Ladies who have laid deep mourning colors, adopt the French mourning styles. A little bonnet made for a lady attending a bonnet and a toque. In looking over the fashion plates illustrating party costumes, one is tempted to believe that some of the old family porframes, and, forgetful of aristocratic lineage, are serving as models to the modern costumer. The youngest, daintitit of the rosebuds are adopting the short Waist and scant draperies which combine to form a witching iraming for youth and beauty-a caprice of fashion that may be of brief duration, but while it lasts lends picturesqueness to the gay ballroom.
